

The objective world and God

The objective world is a strange concept and science is built upon it and can't exist without it.

But science can't explain what the objective world is, except that it gives responses to our experiments.

The objective world is considered truth, because it's never wrong, but our interpretations of it can be.

A Form of omniscient (all knowing)

Everything is a part of the objective world, even the parts we don't know yet.

A Form of omnipresent (all present)

The objective world is the way it is and can't be changed with wishful thinking. When we manage to change anything, that's because the objective world allowed so.

A Form of omnipotent (all powerful)

Could it be that God and the objective world are the same entity?
